OVERVIEW

The Misogyny Index has ticked to 61 (up 1 point from 60), driven almost entirely by social media discourse (score: 77) rather than traditional news coverage (score: 20). While no femicides were recorded in this fortnight, the spike reflects a

MISOGYNY OF THE DAY · PATTERN

No dedicated Misogyny of the Day posts were logged this period, a significant gap in the intelligence feed that suggests either: (a) the platform is under-capturing routine anti-women posts, or (b) the misogyny has migrated to less-monitored spaces (private groups, Telegram, WhatsApp channels). The absence of MOTD data during a 77-point social score

MISOGYNY INDEX · ANALYSIS

The index climb is modest in absolute terms but alarming in composition. Social platforms are carrying 3.85x the misogyny load of news media, signalling that the real conversation--the dangerous one--is happening in comments, shares, and algorithm-recommended rabbit holes, not in headline space. This divergence suggests platform moderation is failing to contain the velocity of anti-women content even as it gains documentary legitimacy.

THE INSIGHT

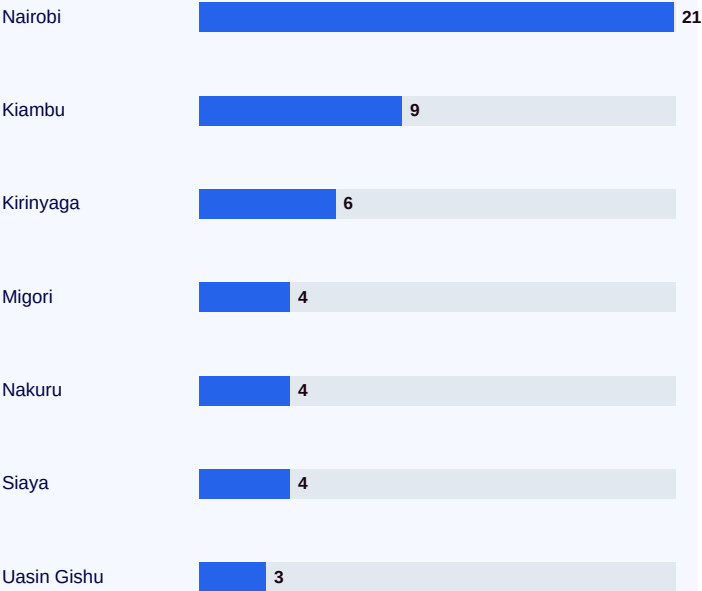

The manosphere is weaponizing documentary credibility to embed itself in Kenyan discourse. When BBC publishes "Manosphere Messiahs," it shifts the conversation from "is this ideology dangerous?" to "how is this global movement operating?"--a framing that implicitly normalizes the existence of the movement. Kenyan podcasters and alternative media then amplify these narratives into unmoderated spaces where young men encounter them without feminist counter-narrative or platform friction. The 1-point index rise masks a structural shift: misogyny is moving from fringe to mainstream distribution channels while staying socially unaddressed. The zero femicides recorded may reflect reporting lag, not safety improvement. Every platform that carried this content without warnings, context, or removal became a recruitment funnel for anti-women ideology.
