OVERVIEW

Kenya's femicide crisis has triggered sustained international attention and domestic mobilisation, with the Misogyny Index holding at 49 (down marginally from 51). This two-point decrease masks a dangerous reality: media coverage has intensified while social media—typically the early warning system—has gone silent, suggesting either platform suppression or a critical intelligence gap. Eight

MISOGYNY OF THE DAY · PATTERN

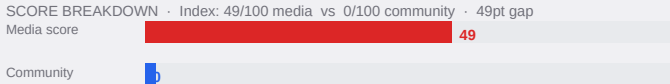

The Misogyny of the Day posts reveal a three-stage pipeline: (1) murder occurs, (2) community mobilises in protest, (3) online misogynists deploy counter-narrative within 48 hours attacking victims' sexual autonomy, family grief, and the legitimacy of protest itself. A Mombasa march against femicide was met with in-person sexual apologism ("children feel the sweetness"), immediately amplified on social media—showing no temporal gap between street-level and digital misogyny. This is a coordinated

TECH-FACILITATED VIOLENCE

Eight cases during this period involved social media as either the crime vector or the post-crime harassment mechanism. Facebook and X are the primary stages where victim-blaming narratives gain traction within hours of discovery, with intimate partner homicides being reframed as "lifestyle consequences" and mutilations being used to gaslight mourners.

MISOGYNY INDEX · ANALYSIS

The index sits at 49/100, driven entirely by news media (score: 49) with zero social platform contribution—an anomaly that demands immediate investigation. BBC and The Star have amplified coverage of systemic femicide patterns, but the absence of social media scoring indicates either algorithmic suppression, data collection failure, or a coordinated shift in where misogyny is now being expressed. This silence on social platforms is itself a warning signal.

THE INSIGHT

Kenya is experiencing a femicide crisis amplified by a misogyny infrastructure that operates in real-time across intimate partner homicides, university-student murders, and mutilation cases. The Misogyny Index's stability at 49 masks a dangerous shift: news media is exposing the crisis while social platforms are simultaneously hosting coordinated counter-narratives that blame victims, gaslight families, and delegitimise protest. The eight tech-facilitated cases indicate that platforms are not neutral: they are active participants in the post-murder harassment cycle. When a self-identified human rights activist on X minimises femicide, when Facebook comments sexualise murdered children, when X users gaslight mutilation victims within 24 hours, we are witnessing not isolated misogyny but systemic platform-enabled violence. The absence of social media scoring in the index suggests our intelligence collection is failing precisely where the pipeline is most dangerous—and this silence must be broken immediately.
