CASES BY COUNTY · CURRENT PERIOD

OVERVIEW

Kenya's femicide crisis has triggered sustained international media attention and domestic mobilisation, with the misogyny index holding steady at 51 during this period—a critical threshold indicating entrenched toxic discourse. While no new cases were formally recorded in our system between 21 May–4 June, eight tech-facilitated incidents and at least four documented murders (Alice Rianga,

MISOGYNY OF THE DAY · PATTERN

The Misogyny of the Day posts reveal a four-stage rationalization pipeline: (1) victim-blaming ("parents get stroke or ulcers" because daughters have autonomy), (2) gaslighting ("nobody is questioning the background"), (3) sexual justification ("children feel the sweetness of sex" when defiled), and (4) gender-essentialist minimization ("let the other gender be satisfied"). This is not random vitriol—it is systematic delegitimization of women's right to exist safely in

TECH-FACILITATED VIOLENCE

Eight tech-facilitated incidents were recorded during this fortnight, concentrated on X and Facebook where misogynist commentary operates with near-total impunity. Platform moderation appears absent or ineffective: a self-identified "human rights activist" posts gender-essentialist abuse without documented removal; victim-blaming

MISOGYNY INDEX · ANALYSIS

The index remains locked at 51, driven entirely by news media sentiment (score: 51) while social platforms register zero—a dangerous blind spot. BBC and The Star's repeated alarming coverage of femicide and "toxic online misogyny" suggests international and national media understand the severity, but the zero social score indicates either platform suppression of our monitoring or a failure to capture real-time misogynist discourse on X and Facebook where the violence is being rationalized. This split reveals that the conversation about femicide is happening about Kenya's women on international platforms, not with them on domestic ones where perpetrators and apologists congregate.

THE INSIGHT

Kenya is experiencing a documented femicide crisis—1,000 women killed in a decade, at least four murders in two weeks—that is being simultaneously exposed and erased. International media (BBC, The Star) are correctly identifying the "toxic online misogyny" as causal infrastructure, yet the social platforms where this misogyny lives report zero sentiment data, indicating a measurement or platform visibility crisis. The misogyny index holding flat at 51 while 8 tech-facilitated incidents and multiple murders accumulate suggests we are capturing news about femicide but missing the real-time discourse enabling it. Most critically: the community has begun to mobilise (hundreds-strong marches), but that resistance is being infiltrated, delegitimized, and atomized across platforms with no visible counter-power.
